

Back in 2020 during the height of the pandemic, there was a trend going around online of people “shifting” to different universes. People, typically teenagers, would share tips and tricks on how to transport themselves into different realities through their dreams. Such tips included writing manifestations onto pieces of paper and tucking it underneath their pillows before they fall asleep. Many people during the pandemic would watch series, which most of the time would be anime. It is also important to note that because it was the pandemic, a lot of people were experiencing the effects of loneliness. So it comes to no surprise that people turned to shifting as a way to cope with the feelings of loneliness. People will often visit these worlds to meet their favorite character, or their “comfort character”. Their goal most of the time is to befriend said characters and to also become part of their stories. A lot of times people will just take an episode from the show and just insert themselves into it when they plan out their shifts.

My website would act as a blog for someone who shifts and is trying to fight off the allegations that it is a farce. They will deny evidence of lucid dreaming and the basics of how dreaming actually works. It will include a personal diary of sorts with their own shifts and a separate page for people to send in their own stories. There will even be a section with stories from different characters from the other realities. There will also be a page for a tutorial on how to shift and the benefits of doing so.

The person running the blog will claim that shifting is life-changing and actually beneficial for one’s overall well-being. They will say that it is much better to leave our current reality for others because it is better to be in the know than the unknown. They will say that we know the other worlds much better than our own because we have a visual understanding of what the other world looks like.

The diary entries will start pretty calm with them just meeting their favorite character and making quick friendships with everyone else from that world. The blogger will slowly include entries that will become a little bit more questioning as they begin to stray from the main plot of the story. The last of the entries will basically have the blogger claim to be that world’s god and brag about how it is much more fun to be in a world where everyone listens to you without question.
